Bundy left early this morning, bound for Cadenabbia, in Italy, where he will lunch with Chancellor Adenauer.

Mac has made here, as he does everywhere, a most favorable impression. Besides his unusual mental gifts, he is one of the most companionable and agreeable of men. As a couple, they are unusual and refreshing.

Buck Crawford lunched with me at Bucks. He is on his annual tour of the British Isles and the Continent. In the course of these trips, he sees customers of James H. Oliphant & Co. He has been successful for years in securing investments by the Scottish and English investment trusts in the American market. He takes a gloomy view of the immediate prospects of Wall Street emerging from its torpor.

Tonight we had dinner at the house with the Louchheims and the William Clarks.

Jean Monnet lunched with me. He thinks, in spite of the furore over the Common Market characterizing the present Labour Party Conference at Brighton, the Government will have the necessary votes to enable the UK to enter. He believes the political situation in France to be unusually tricky, and thinks the de Gaulle Government may fail to stave off a vote of censure tomorrow. If carried, this would mean the fall of the Pompidou Cabinet, with unpredictable consequences to follow. Monnet's chief preoccupation at the moment is over the International Monetary situation. He regards the attitude of our Treasury authorities as [redacted] too stiff and somewhat unrealistic. This evening, I had a long talk on the same subject with Walter Louchheim, who agrees generally with Monnet's views. Walter has submitted several memoranda on the subject to the President. Evidently there is a conflict in Washington between State and Treasury, as well as elsewhere, including the White House, on this matter.
